

An Inflated Ball [The Scheme Of Currency]

By James Dye

A hollow ball floats downstream gracefully from bank to bank, suspended free from attachments
like ice-cream scoops in soft drinks.

This is the scheme of currency:
It fluctuates at a fixed rate,
Great interest hovers sweetly,
as the world economy slumps
down dead slowly to the floor.

The floods are getting going fast.
As the level of liquid rises,
the fail floats on from bank to bank
doubling twice the precession.

The ball is dead in the water on a fishing line that has cork as bait from stucco rafts attached to fleets of hollow wharfs.

© 2011, James Dye