

Lost Words

By Jason Anderson

Detached from the embrace of a writer's mind, they wander off into the void of the forgotten, unable to provide inspiration for a beautiful scribe, as they are forced to remain silent until called upon.
The craftsman becomes blank as he grasps his pen, pressing the tip against paper prepared to compose, but his process of thought is blocked by a veiled force, which constricts his mind's voice preventing it to speak.
Without the words to create a masterpiece of written art, the writer falls in to the abyss of depression and distraught, losing the passion for his true craft which he is gifted with, while he feels unworthy of penning the words of his soul.
The creator of a work of art such as a painter, sculptor, or singer, requires the precious tool which makes him an accomplished artist, but without the passion of his pen's voice to speak on paper, and the tools he needs to write, they will only remain as lost words.
